In the course of inhuman, or rather animal events, it often becomes necessary to desecrate a certain minimum period with which to make a great clean up around the house. Old Farmer Al was a rather ingenuous old devil and so he trained his fuzzy poodle dogs to act as mops for him, and with six of them working in precision, each ducking himself into water, wringing out and exchanging mop handles in mechanical order, makes the work of cleaning up comparatively an easy one.

Many things of unimportance happen during the day, but as time goes on, the poor farmer's house becomes miserable for old Al, and his side kick Timerly Cat. After being annoyed for fully half an hour while they were scrubbing the front porch by these mice throwing bricks into their wash water, old Al decides, then and there to have a fight to a finish. He chases them off the roof, down the chimney and thru the stove pipe. He slams them hot and heavy, until they decide to run away. Al congratulates himself and Timerly on the good results and returns to his front parlor to enjoy peace and quiet. Two mice pull up a dummy cat, leave it at his front door and ring the bell. The farmer finds with it a note, saying, "This cat will scare away all mice", and is signed, "A Friend". Once the Cat is inside its head falls off and seventy million mice come out. The dummy cat proves to be a trojan horse filled with the enemy. As the mice fill the house the farmer and his cat, fall dead away in a faint. The cleverness of the mice was too much for them in one day.

Aesop' says; - "Whenever you get something for nothing, look out for the hook."
